Gulf of Mexico Update

April 30, 2010

Apache Corporation continues to monitor the impact of the oil spill which occurred on April 20 at Mississippi Canyon Block 252. At the present time, Apache has no further information regarding the progress of efforts to contain the oil spill beyond what has been reported in the media. As of April 30, the oil spill has not impacted Apache's Gulf of Mexico operations or production from any of its offshore facilities. Drilling operations from six operated rigs in the Gulf of Mexico are ongoing.

Mariner Energy Transaction

Apache anticipates closing its merger with Mariner Energy as soon as regulatory and shareholder approvals are obtained.

Senior White House Advisor David Axelrod Comments and White House Clarification

This morning, April 30, White House senior advisor David Axelrod made the following comment on ABC's Good Morning America regarding the potential halting of new offshore drilling:

No additional drilling has been authorized and none will until we find out what happened here and whether there was something unique and preventable here.

Axelrod's statement was quickly clarified by White House and Interior Department officials. The clarification, as reported by Wall Street Journal reporters Stephen Power and Ian Talley, is as follows:

Shortly after Axelrod spoke, however, White House and Interior Department officials clarified that currently planned offshore petroleum exploration and production drilling can continue. The officials said media reports misinterpreted Axelrod's statement.

The Obama administration has been considering whether and where it may open new offshore areas to exploration between 2012 and 2017. Before production moves forward in a new region of the Gulf of Mexico, the Mid or South Atlantic, or the Arctic Ocean, an area will have to undergo thorough environmental analysis, public input and comment, scientific study and review, and a careful examination of the potential risks and spill response capabilities in that area, a White House official said.

Apache will adapt to this changing situation as it unfolds.
