Holly Corporation & Frontier Oil Corporation

Weekly Communiqué Merger Update #13

Video Three

Below is the transcript of a video message delivered by Holly Corporation's President, Dave Lamp and Frontier Oil Corporation's Chairman, President and Chief Executive Officer, Mike Jennings, to both Holly and Frontier employees on June 10, 2011.

Dave Lamp:

The philosophy of management to me is employee engagement. Be there, help them be successful, be there to help guide them to what the company needs and what's most productive. Be there to help them be the best they can be.

Mike Jennings:

I think we need to set a high bar, in terms of having our managers and ourselves develop people in this company, because that is our future. So we're going to hold people accountable for doing that, and we're going to manage it through our performance management process. Beyond that, we're going to hold ourselves to a high standard of developing a company that provides for career growth for people, and that is important, because you need some stability in an industry that has a lot of volatility around it, and you need growth.

Dave Lamp:

I'm big on management by wandering around. I like to get in front of people and hear their questions and have frank discussions about issues.

Dave Lamp:

I think I'd describe the Holly culture as largely a performance driven organization. Which were just as those things I mentioned are important and cherished. You have the bubble up effect of those people that are most talented, best, move up through the organization. It's kind of competitive in that aspect, but that's in my experience, the best way to do it. The other thing I'd talk about in Holly is we always try to respond to market conditions quickly. Be the first. We take risks that are appropriate, but we are not by any means conservative investors.

Mike Jennings:

Frontier has been a can-do culture through time. It has been a relatively small company. We started out with one refinery, that being in Cheyenne, Wyoming and fairly small at 50,000 barrels a day of crude capacity. We added the El Dorado refinery in 1999, but it was a big bet for the company at the time. And it could have gone either way. We managed through it very well, and again, that sort of can-do attitude is something that has allowed us to endure through time. We have made some very good bets in terms of investing in our business, upgrading our refineries to handle more heavy crude. But still we lack scale as a business, and that's addressed by this combination with Holly. I think Holly comes from very similar roots. Recognize that between 1970 and 2005 about half of the U.S. refineries went out of business. Clearly, Holly and Frontier have endured, and the reason is really that similar can-do attitude; making do in lean times, harvesting in rich times, and growing the business and growing refineries through that period.

Dave Lamp:

Economic analysis is one that we cherish in our company, and really try to spread out that concept of critical thinking. In critical thinking you're really evaluating all the alternatives, optimizing the base case, really understanding the key drivers for anything you're doing. Whether it's people related, asset related, or market related. If the synergy is there they're going to fit like a glove, the two of them. I don't really see anything that gets in the way of that.

Mike Jennings:

But from a very high level in terms of what is our strategic purpose, it is safe, reliable, refining operations. That is the foundation for what we're trying to accomplish day to day. Beyond that we want to invest in this business. We want to put more money in capital on the ground so that we can put distance between ourselves and the next best competitor.

Dave Lamp:

Well the practices and policies that I think are important to be successful to move forward really come back to our values. And if you really look at those values, they're not a long read so it's pretty easy to go through them, but they really come down to three of them focused on doing the right things for our community and our employees—safety, environmental performance, following the law, but the other two are equally important, which is honesty and respect for each other, as well as continuous improvement. If you look at those last two, that is where the people side of it is. We want to create that environment that is productive for you to excel. And then on top of that, we want you to have the attitude that where I'm at is not the best it can be, and therefore how do we find those and exploit those ways to do it? It's all about passion to me. If you come to work with that hop in your step, and your outlook and you're hungry and you're hunting, you've got to spend a lot of time at work, you might as well make it fun.
